Farmers Feeding Utah is partnering with the Utah Petroleum Association to offer much needed assistance to farmers and families in rural Utah. The Miracle Project Uinta Basin event will take place September 25, from 5-7 p.m. at the Western Park in Vernal and will include a check presentation from the state's oil and gas sector to support Farmers Feeding Utah's ongoing mission.

"Energy workers across Utah have been serving on the frontlines of the pandemic since February and have seen first-hand the impacts in our rural communities," said Utah Petroleum Association president Rikki Hrenko-Browning. "On behalf of our member companies, I am pleased to see our association partnering with Farmers Feeding Utah to make sure families in this community have the support and nutrition they need, and truly believe we will recover faster when we look out for one another."

Thousands of individuals have lost employment and signed up for the Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program (SNAP) in Utah, and many of them live in the Duchesne and Uintah Counties. With the continued impact of the Coronavirus, these numbers continue to rise. With the decline in demand for fuel, many energy companies have been on hold – greatly impacting the many families working in that industry.

"More than six months into this devastating pandemic and Utah's farmers and families continue to feel the impact. The economy of eastern Utah and jobs in the energy sector have been hit especially hard, so we knew it was time to grow another miracle," said Ron Gibson, president of the Utah Farm Bureau. "Utahns have been incredibly generous and stepped up to the challenge on our earlier projects, and I'm confident we'll rise to meet this new one as well."

Farmers Feeding Utah is a campaign of the Miracle of Agriculture Foundation, a 501(c)(3) organization that was set up as the charitable arm of the Utah Farm Bureau Federation. Additional logistical and in-kind support has come from invaluable partners, including Utah State University (USU) and its Hunger Solutions Institute, the Utah

Department of Agriculture & Food (UDAF), The Church of Jesus-Christ of Latter-day Saints, and Farm Bureau Financial Services.

“By serving a community in the Uinta Basin, Farmers Feeding Utah is able to react quickly to the economic conditions in the area and connect families and individuals in need with healthy food choices from Utah farms,” said Heidi LeBlanc, Director of the Hunger Solutions Institute at USU. “Together Farm Bureau, Utah State University and other volunteers, partners and donors re inspiring public confidence and support in American agriculture and meeting hunger needs at the same time.”

“As harm drags on, more and more families need help – both our farm families and our neighbors struggling with food insecurity,” Gibson said. “With the help of donors and businesses, we’ve been able to rise to the challenge so far, but we need their help again now.”

Volunteers will soon notify the recently unemployed with details about picking up the farm-fresh food on September 25. Donations to the ‘Miracle of Agriculture Foundation’ for the Farmers Feeding Utah project are used to purchase, process, and deliver food to families in need, giving both struggling farmers and Utah families a hand up.

A check presentation from the Utah Petroleum Association will take place at the event on September 25.

To date, the Farmers Feeding Utah campaign has raised more than $400,000 in donations from individuals and businesses, and provided more than 500,000 lbs. of food, with a retail value of more than $500,000 to Utah residents in the Navajo Nation, northern Utah, West Salt Lake, Ogden and to smaller community pantries throughout the Wasatch Front.
